AV MRS, EFGENIA DENLAP POTTS.

"Realty, sir, I am konored ! But, sir, let me assure you that with every appreciation of a true gentleman's linnest love, I can and do tell you, "No." Let there be no more words between us."

"Ali!" he exclaimed lu hitter frony, "you think to trent me as you ild that silly boy I met just now; but what was his petty offering compared with my mature affection. Be not distainful. Ethel, but look upon me with the face that won my heart."

"You are a strange man, Mr. Hampton I have never been addressed in the imperious language you employ, and yet you are pleased to call it love. Be assured that if I have paused to listen to you it is because I owe you at least common courtesy after having been no untortunate as to inspire you with more than an ordinary friendship. If you are sincere I thank you; have twice suid-un." And she gracefully withdrew.

CHAPTER VIL.

It was Ethel's last night at, Crab mance, Orchard She declined to go into the hall-room, and still wearing the soft black grenadine she had worn at supper, she sat down in a honey-suckle arior just in front of her window.
